For a slow war, too, ten millions in addition to our usual defensive expenditure will probably suffice. Fifteen millions should be ample. Now, no one who looks deliberately at the comparative or the absolute resources of Great Britain-at her wealth in Pitt's time and at her wealth now-or at the vast sums which for years we have been expending in railways and foreign loansneed feel much anxiety at any inconvenience which this comparatively small amount of annual increment will cause us. The probability is, that if judiciously raised, it would scarcely be felt as a burden at all -It would simply cause a smaller expenditure in other ways-a postponement of some undertakings in which the enterprise of the nation would otherwise have overflowed. Never were we in so flourishing or so United States, who fell in the discharge of his duty, capable a condition of entering on a costly struggle. The population of the country has doubled since the middle of the last war; its wealth has probably at least quadrupled; its productive power has increased in a still greater ratio; while its naval and military expenditure will certainly (per annum) not exceed one-half-except on the supposition of the war being a gigantic and therefore a brief one.
